COVE,

OR COVE OF CORK, is a sea-port, in the parishes of Clonmel and Templeroobin, barony of Barrymore, county of Cork, 10 miles E.S.E. from the city of Cork; situated on the south side of GREAT ISLAND, the extent of which is five miles from east to west, and two from north to south, communicating with the mainland by two ferries—East and West Passage. This charmingly situated town overlooks and almost literally overhangs the spacious basin of Inner Cork Harbour, and occupies the steep and southern face of a hill, rising terrace above terrace, from near the edge of the water, to a considerable height in the acclivity. The principal streets are wide and commodious, and the houses regularly built. Within the last thirty years, the town has greatly increased in dimensions, population, and importance, and there are now some excellent houses building on the property of Smith Barry, Esq. calculated for the accommodation of the most respectable families. An interesting work on Ireland and its towns thus speaks of Cove. 'Previous to the North American war of independence, Cove consisted of little more than the mud cabins of a few fishermen.' In 1750, Doctor Smith described it as 'a village built under a steep hill inhabited by seamen and revenue officers.' In 1752,
