

TIPPERARY.

AN ancient market town, in the parish and county of its name, barony of Clanwilliam, is 110 miles s.w. from Dublin, 23 w.n.w. from Clonmel, 56 s.w. from Waterford, and 27 s.e. from Limerick; situated on the main road leading to the last named cities, and on that also running to Dungarvan, from which town it is distant 47 miles. It is a town of great antiquity, and is said to have derived its name from Tippa-Rae, signifying, in the Irish language, the 'Well of the plains,' from its situation at the base of the Sliereamuck hills; and the slight modification to its present appellation gives to this etymological authority all the importance of probability. The town, which is pleasantly seated on the river Arra, consists of one principal street, from which several smaller ones branch off at right angles. Within the last ten or twelve years considerable improvements have been made under the provisions of the cleansing act, and many of the old houses have been razed, and superseded by new buildings, so that the town may lay claim to the distinction of being a neat one, and its trade, though somewhat limited, is tolerably thriving. Corn, butter, and other agricultural produce, is the business staple; and there is a very tolerable retail trade, for the supply of the populous and extensive surrounding district. The produce before mentioned is chiefly purchased at the markets, and sent, for shipment, to Waterford and Limerick. The 'National Bank of Ireland,' and the 'Tipperary Banking Company,' have branches in the town, and these establishments are of great convenience to commercial operations. Petty sessions are held, every Thursday, by the local magistrates—one being pro tempore. A new gaol and courthouse, union workhouse, and the gas-works, are the most conspicuous public buildings.

The church, a modern erection, calculated to accommodate a congregation of one thousand persons, is built entirely of stone, and may compete with most others in the kingdom for elegance. It consists of a nave and transept with side aisles and galleries, having a handsome tower seventy-two feet high, surmounted by a spire of seventy feet. The Catholic chapel is a commodious building, and that for the worship of Presbyterians is neat and sufficiently capacious. The principal charities are three free schools, ably conducted, and a dispensary and fever hospital, skillfully superintended. A chalybeate spring, which issues from the adjoining hills, is frequented, during the summer, for its reputed medicinal efficacy, but it is not extensively appreciated. The market is held on Thursday, and the fairs April 5th, June 24th, October 10th, and December 10th. Tipperary parish contained, in 1831, 9,038 inhabitants, including 7,379 resident in the town.
